Sow from one peck to half a bushel Sow from one peck to half a bushel of seed per acre; drag in with not too heavy a harrow, and by all means follow with a roller or plank clod-crusher, as that insures covering the seed evenly, and in case there is no immediate rain it will insure more of the seed growing. Cut when fully ripe. Those that have self-rakers can leave them in the gavels just as drowned. Those having binders just as dropped. Those having binders or headers let the flax run in a continuous stream and stack as soon as well dried. Just here many make the mis-take of leaving it out. Rain on it bleaches the seed, rots the straw and bothers the machines in threshing. To raise flax on prairie sod is quite different matter. Success in that cas depends largely upon having a good rain just after it has been sown. It is best on sod to plow narrow furrow fur-rows, even in depth and width, so as to leave the surface level and smooth. The narrower the furrows the more seed will be likely to grow, as it will drop in along the ridges of the furrows. Har-rowing does not amount to much on raw sod, as it makes little impression. To all who are suffering from the errors and Something that will cut, like a coulter cultivator, is the best thing. One or two good rains just after seeding are worth more than all the work that can
